

Position Statement on Academic Freedom

December 16, 2021

The Association for Psychological Science (APS) affirms the value of academic freedom, which is the freedom of academic psychological scientists—and those from other disciplines—to produce and disseminate knowledge through research, teaching, practice, and service without undue constraint. Academic freedom is essential to advance the common good and the search for truth. APS Members must comply with all relevant codes of ethical behavior in psychological science with respect to the pursuit of academic freedom.

Adapted from the April 2013 statement of the Association of American Universities and the mission of the American Association of University Professors.

Also see a related update posted on February 16, 2023, concerning recent political challenges to academic freedom around the world.